How well-placed are UK organisations - both in the private and public spheres - to defend against cyber-attacks, including their funding and hiring policies at a time when government considers incentivising the hiring of cyber security experts? With new threats including more sophisticated cyber-crime and state sponsored hacking what is the latest thinking on best practice across sectors - including finance, M2M, telecoms and data - including common and specific threats? With SMEs often able to be more agile in terms of innovation, but with a heightened vulnerability to attacks due to a smaller scale, how can SMEs better protect themselves from cyber-attacks?

What is the latest thinking on encouraging more people into careers in cyber security, particularly women and the young, and how does the education system - from school, through FE, HE and apprenticeships - need to respond in developing curricula, improving careers advice and engaging more effectively with industry? With government announcing funding of £1.9 billion of public investment as part of its National Cyber Security Strategy what are the priorities for support and resource allocation that can maximise the UK's position in R&D and the implementation of new technological innovations? What are the prospects for the UK as an exporter of cyber security expertise and services at a time of considerable political upheaval post-Brexit? How successful have accreditation schemes like Cyber Essentials been in terms of adoption and reputation, and how can this be built on? What are the implications of the trend for SMEs in this space to be picked up in M&A with larger organisations? How does the UK compare internationally with regard to funding and investment in cyber technologies, and in further partnership and other forms of support for the sector?
