How effective will the new framework be in further developing multi-agency co-operation between professionals to more successfully identify and tackle all forms of child abuse from the earliest stage; what more can be done to support collaboration? In what ways can the current barriers to effective co-operation mentioned in the Wood Report, such as the cost of arrangements and the time devoted to bureaucracy and meetings, be overcome? What role should schools and other organisations involved in child protection be expected to play in these arrangements? How effective have the new joint area inspections, launched in February 2016, been in assessing multi-agency collaboration and identifying areas for improvement? What will be the impact of abolishing Serious Case Reviews (SCRs) on the process of learning lessons from failures to protect children, and what steps should be taken to ensure that the new Child Safeguarding Practice Review Panel is effective? In what ways will these changes affect the social work profession? How best can child protection services be supported to avoid disruption to their work whilst implementing fundamental structural changes? How successful would proposals to introduce mandatory reporting and a 'duty to act' be in tackling child abuse and neglect, in light of a government consultation on the topic, and what would be the effect on social workers, health authorities and schools in particular?
