What impact has guidance in the 'No health without mental health: implementation framework' for translating the Government's vision for mental health into reality, as well as the introduction of local Healthwatch, had so far in improving patient experience and personalising care? With the implementation framework seeking to put patients at the heart of clinical practice, what more should be done by the NHS and local authorities to involve service users, their families and carers, in service design and delivery? As the framework underlines the importance of measuring and reporting on progress, how effective have the current data standards been for tracking and improving patient experience, and what more, if anything, should be done to identify data gaps and areas for improvement? Should local authorities do more to improve the transition between children's and adults' mental health care, and if so, what? With Personal Health Budgets (PHBs) being extended to mental health, how should awareness and uptake of PHBs be increased, and are patients being offered enough choice of services?

Is existing specialist support and guidance for commissioning mental health services, such as the NICE Quality Standard for depression in adults, sufficient for commissioners; what further support should be put in place? What are the early indicators for how effectively new commissioning bodies are working together to further promote innovation, reduce inequalities and establish collaborative practices, and what impact is this having on the choice and provision of services? What more should be done to encourage the commissioning of talking therapies which offer the full range of NICE-approved therapies, and to what extent will this improve accessibility and outcomes for all groups, especially older people and BME communities? How should the independent and third sectors facilitate integration of care through the support they provide commissioners and services they commission?
