- 9.15 - 10.15 Provision, uptake and teaching at primary and secondary level
Within the practical and resource constraints being experienced by schools what characterises a well-rounded music education, and what measures might be needed to address concerns from some stakeholders that the move away from subject-specific inspection for music by Ofsted is leading to a reduction in provision at primary and secondary level? In light of music not being included in the EBacc, alongside the proposed target for 90% of pupils taking the EBacc, what steps can be taken to support levels of pupil uptake? With increasing non-specialist teaching of music how should issues of teacher workload and ensuring appropriate standards be approached?

Following the announcement of £300m in continued funding until 2020, how effectively is the Music Education Hubs (MEH) model coordinating the multiple elements of music education and improving the consistency of provision across the board? With concern initially expressed from Ofsted about insufficient engagement between MEHs and schools, what further steps could be taken to improve coordination? With 72% of MEHs income coming from sources other than the Department for Education in 2015, what are the issues and options for ensuring their financial sustainability in the future? What is the place of alternative models to MEHs, such as the Cornwall Music Service Trust, in the provision of music education?

How well are the existing pathways through music education serving the needs of today's students? What role can the music industry play in career guidance for students and increasing participation in education and extra-curricular activities; what structures could be put in place to build the involvement of the industry in education? With Government funding being provided for disadvantaged children through schemes such as the In Harmony orchestral programme, what further initiatives and strategies can be employed to widen accessibility within music education?
