- 9.40 - 10.35 Priorities for shaping services and supporting reform in the primary care sector
With a shortage of GPs - along with an aging workforce - cited as key issues for primary care, how should the challenge of training greater numbers of GPs be approached? Can GP training be further enhanced - including through greater immersion within general practice settings - to prepare young doctors for work? How could improved opportunities for further professional development and career widening within general practice be introduced to help to retain staff within the sector in Northern Ireland? In the development of primary care infrastructure - and in line with the policy priorities stemming from Delivering Together - how can investment be used most effectively in building sustainable and effective centres of primary and community care, including in multi-disciplinary hubs of care? How could digital and medical technology be further integrated into current and future primary care infrastructure and used to help improve efficiency in services? With the proposed shift in services toward primary care, what are the priorities for commissioning - particularly in local commissioning groups - in the context of achieving value for money? Given the scale of reform to primary care services, how sufficiently have patient voices been considered in shaping services, and what opportunities might patients and users have in ongoing and subsequent reviews of reformed services?

How can the needs of local populations be best reflected in the reform of primary and community care services - as hubs of community care are formed with the inclusion and integration of community nurses, mental health workers, allied health professionals and other services into practices - and what steps will these need to take to help improve pathways between acute, primary, community and secondary care? Given the growing need to treat patients with multiple conditions across different life stages, what are examples of best practice - such as current community pharmacy schemes and community hubs; how can this experience be most effectively shared and rolled out effectively in other areas to improve outcomes for patients? With a focus on putting patients at the centre of their own care, and to reduce waiting times in primary care settings, what changes are needed in the way support is delivered to enhance self-management of long-term conditions - particularly through effective guidance and signposting to the most appropriate services? What options - including the devolution of budgetary and commissioning powers - can help GP Federations provide the best services to their patients, specifically to the needs of local populations?
