10.10 - 10.55   Policy priorities for protecting children online
How can UK and international policymakers improve the safety of young people online? Following the government's response to the Bailey Review and the Parliamentary Enquiry into Children protection, what progress has been made in protecting children online and what are the next steps? How effectively is the advertising industry working to prevent the commercialisation and sexualisation of children by online content? Will 'ParentPort' become an effective mechanism for parents and citizens to complain about online content aimed at children? How should the seven regulators behind the project share responsibility for its actions and decide on appropriate redress to complaints?
Peter Johnson, Chief Executive Officer, The Authority for Television On Demand (ATVOD)
Alexandra Scott, Senior Public Affairs Executive, Internet Advertising Bureau (IAB)
Alison Marshall, Public Affairs Director, UNICEF UK (UK Committee for the United Nations International Children's Fund)
Questions and comments from the floor with Andy Baker, Deputy Chief Executive Officer, Child Exploitation and Online Protection Centre (CEOP)

Caroline Dinenage MP, Member, Parliamentary Enquiry into Online Child Protection

11.25 - 12.10   Practical measures for a safer web: cooperation, POS restrictions and next steps
Following the major four ISPs' commitment to offering parents child website restrictions at the point of sale, how effective will parental filters such as TalkTalk's HomeSafe and Virgin Media's Security Parental Control be in protecting children online? What further measures might be needed? What impact will these network level filters have on consumer internet security products? What content do these filters prevent users from viewing; what is missing? Are there services that are likely to be unfairly threatened by these filters? Should the blacklist of blocked sites be open to public scrutiny? How does the form of internet access used - such as fixed line, mobile or public Wi-Fi - affect the level of protection children receive? How effective are age verification measures be used to restrict access to age restricted products, and how might they be improved?
Jonny Shipp, Head of Digital Confidence, Telefónica
Susie Hargreaves, Chief Executive Officer, Internet Watch Foundation
John Carr, Secretary, UK Children's Charities' Coalition on Internet Safety
