With one in three children now leaving primary school either obese or overweight, how can costs, skills issues and other pressures be balanced with the drive to improve food standards? What more could be done to provide children with specific dietary requirements with tailored quality meals? With a focus on primary schools within the childhood obesity plan, including the newly introduced voluntary code, what further could be done to extend new measures to early years and secondary schools, as well as promote compliance in academies and free schools? With the obesity plan highlighting wider settings - such as leisure centres - as areas where food options need to be healthier, is further action needed on the sale of HFSS food to children needed, and is this best on a voluntary, regulatory or legislative basis?
