How aware is the public of the dangers that exist online? How successful have campaigns such as 'click clever, click safe', 'zip it, block it, flag it' been at increasing children's understanding of how to stay safe online? What can be done to strengthen the knowledge base about how children and young people use digital technologies, including mobile phones and consoles? Does more need to be done to ensure users are aware of the specific and unique dangers in these less obvious methods of connecting to the internet – such as in-game chat and instant messaging? How can young people and children be encouraged to 'manage their digital space'?

Questions and comments from the floor
- 11.35 - 12.25 Building a code of practice for online content
How far does the UKCCIS 'UK Child Internet Safety Strategy' form a basis for self-regulation moving forwards? Does the code adequately take into account the international nature, and desire for global brand uniformity, of social networking and other websites? Are business and providers on track to meet the December 2010 deadline (set in the Review of Progress) to build a 'clear code of practice'? How can they be helped to work collaboratively both with each other and public bodies? What can UKCCIS do to assist stakeholders? Is self-regulation the right fit, or should Government take up the option to bring sites under the remit of a 'designated regulator'?
